200 crore each year. "In reality, charity has only been a camouflage for the Jamaat's terrorist factory," says J&K Police chief Kuldeep Khoda. "The ISI has been using it as a terror instrument to calibrate terror operations in Kashmir and elsewhere in India," he adds. To bankroll its jihad, the LeT also utilises financiers like Mahmoud Mohammad Ahmed Bahaziq who raised funds in Saudi Arabia.

Intelligence debriefings of captured Lashkar operatives including Fahim Arshad Ansari, arrested by the UP Police earlier this year, have given the Indian security establishment an elaborate picture of the camps which trained the LeT. Recruits are drafted by the numerous JUD offices through Pakistan, mainly in Punjab. They are then sent to Baitul Mujahideen where they are meticulously documented—photographed, fingerprinted and given identity cards—to enable both the ISI and the LeT to keep tabs on them and family members. These recruits are then sent to the Maskar-e-Ummalkura training camp located in the thick coniferous forests above Baitul Mujahideen.

Each of these three camps have a few permanent structures where recruits are housed in tents, usually 15 to 20 youth per tent, and at least seven different training programmes are carried out by retired military personnel. These range from basic courses on weapon handling and firing to advanced courses in espionage and communications. The recruits are fed on a diet of Quranic knowledge, propaganda films like Kashmir jal raha hai and even Sylvester Stallone's Rambo 3.

Today, it is a mini-state within a state that runs like a well-oiled multinational corporation. Its front, the JUD headed by the avuncular red henna-bearded and salwar-wearing Saeed, has nearly 700 offices in most districts of Pakistan. It has an elaborate system of fund collection from Saudi Arabia and domestic sources, raising between Rs 30 crore and Rs

Glorification of its cadres killed in Kashmir forms a part of the LeT's ingenious tactics to maintain a running pipeline of recruits. Whenever a jihadi is killed in Indian territory, the LeT's clandestine communication network in Kashmir relays the news to master control station in POK. Soon thereafter, a 'ghayabana namaz-e-janaza' (a funeral prayer in absentia) is organised at the deceased militant's native place where the JUD and LeT leaders honour his parents and deliver fiery anti-India rants, exhorting the local youth to enrol themselves for
