

India's Best Colleges

JUNE 22, 2009

INDIA TODAY presents its exclusive survey of academic excellence in six major streams—arts, commerce, science, law, engineering and medicine. Plus, ranking of colleges in 12 major cities.

“Such fine-tuned ranking processes generate energy, enthusiasm and expectations that propel excellence. Economic slumps and tough benchmarks only afflict complacent institutions.”

Learning Curve

The comprehensive survey ushers in a competitive spirit and sets the benchmark for improving standards (“Best Colleges in India”, June 22). Among the medical colleges, AIIMS retains its numero uno position. But it is rather sad that a private doctor had to attend to the prime minister. The new Government should end the controversies that surrounded the institution during the previous regime to keep its image intact in the public eye.

The survey is indeed a mini-encyclopedia on the portals of higher education in India. As the primary intention was to present information on the institutes of higher

Down and Out

Today's BJP is a motley crowd of individual talent and ability, but apparently devoid of passionate nationalism that was at one point of time the party's greatest attribute and asset (“Smell of a Mutiny”, June 22). The party needs to rejuvenate itself by weeding out inept partymen who have only been problem makers and have outlived their utility for the party.

Though the voters have elected the BJP as the second largest national party, its top leaders are bent upon committing harakiri in full public view by blaming each other. Thus, Jaswant Singh must share the responsibility for the rout in Rajasthan. That he had to flee to West Bengal to win a seat in the Lok Sabha is an eloquent tribute to his self-efficacy.

learning, the study should not have been confined to 12 cities. This will definitely make the survey more extensive and time-consuming, but it can still be expanded to known institutions in other cities and towns.

The grand old party is now firmly in the saddle, but there seems to be no change in its outlook when it comes to settling scores with the Opposition (“Graft Grips Left”, June 22). As a consequence, the stand-off between octogenarian Kerala Chief Minister Achuthanandan and CPI(M) state secretary Vijayan came in handy for the Congress to nail the already bruised Left for letting it down last year.
