

KIIT University, Bhubaneswar

A DREAM REALIZED

The immortal lines of Robert Frost, 'I have promises to keep, Miles to go before I sleep' are literally being translated by a man, who just ventured out to do something for his fellowmen. It is a dream comes true for Achyuta Samanta when his tiny industrial training institute of just 12 students in 1997 grew into a mammoth institution to be declared as a university in 2004 by the Ministry of HRD, Government of India.

Everything seems to have been so meticulously planned and executed that Kalinga Institute of Industrial Technology (KIIT) University still continues to forge ahead in pursuit of excellence. Economists and Planners just take a pause to gauge how the outskirts of the sleepy township of Bhubaneswar transformed itself into a vibrant city centre agog with activities since 1997 opened up its academic conglomerate. The architect of this transformation is neither a Daedalus nor the recipient of a Nobel in economics but a man from a non-descript village in Orissa who grew in abject poverty with no one to go for help when his father died before his fifth birthday.

It is sheer miracle that KIIT has grown into one of the finest universities of the world, spreading over 350 acres of land in sixteen lush green campuses having 50 lakhs sq.ft of built up area housing 23 constituent schools running 40 programmes for sixteen thousand students in 13 hostels and over 50 state of the art labs, being taken care of, by 600 faculty and 2500 management and support staff. The recruitment of nearly 70 alumni of IITs including some M. Tech and Ph.Ds, this year is expected to make KIIT excel in its academic endeavors.
