

THE SUCCESS OF THE THOUSANDS AT THE TOP OF THE PYRAMID SHOULD NOT DISTRACT US FROM THE POTENTIAL OF THE MILLIONS AT THE BOTTOM.

Infrastructure like health and education need to be supplemented by a conscious strategy to engage the “bottom of the pyramid” in the growth process. I have always believed that only an “inclusive growth process” will enable us to unleash the dormant energy lying at the bottom.

The challenge lies in extending the reach of healthcare and education to the far flung villages which still house close to 70 per cent of our population. It’s heartening that there already exists an overwhelming consensus around enhanced budgetary allocation for these critical sectors and successive governments, despite their ideological differences, have shown remarkable commitment in this regard. Today, if we need to work seriously on something, it is the delivery mechanism that has consistently failed our investments in these areas. An enlarged role for Public-Private Partnerships (PPP) holds the key here. It has already been showing visible results in the area of education. We only need to broaden the
