

India Tomorrow

AUGUST 24, 2009

Sixty-two years ago, "Tomorrow" was the midnight dream of a free people. Today the sweep of our dream is a measure of our freedom.

“The political and bureaucratic classes have a vested interest in fostering caste, religious and sexual diversities which in turn prevent the development of a national character and national pride.”

Looking Ahead

The cover of the Independence Day issue ("India Tomorrow", August 24) aptly reflected the mood of the nation. The eminent writers looked imaginatively into the future of the country. Though there's plenty to cheer for, we must also ensure two square meals and a roof for millions of people and also reduce the problem of unemployment. Also, Jammu and Kashmir continues to sting us, and the menace of deep-rooted corruption is a blot on our good name. India will be what we make of it. So, let's all carry out our respective tasks to the best of our ability. If we look up, India looks up.

I am glad that Professor Amartya Sen pinpointed

The Great Divide

The analysis of Jaswant Singh's book Jinnah: India-Partition-Independence was incisive and impartial ("The Anti-Hero of Freedom", August 24). While raking up the merits and demerits of Partition, Singh has hit the nail on the head by tracing the multitude of problems that continue to plague the nation. The book may just boost the Indo-Pak peace process that has taken a severe beating post-26/11.

It is the responsibility of historians to dig deep into the authentications and inquire into the premises of the alleged logical derivation that convinced Jaswant Singh of Jinnah's impeccable conduct during Partition. They should also examine the references and bibliographical evidence that forms the basis of the book.

the real problem of our country, namely social and economic injustice and inequalities ("An Unequal Country", August 24). However, I failed to understand why he is not bringing out the real reasons behind these, such as unequal ownership of natural resources like land, water, wealth and income in society. Indian citizens would further appreciate if experts like him were to make some practical suggestions on how such inequalities could be reduced.
