

What India Needs

MAY 11, 2009

Stretched between the economic slowdown and the spectre of terrorism, India has no room for excuses like consensus or rustic rhetoric. The new regime must act immediately to get it right. Failure is not an option.

“People vote for stability, good governance and development. The first and foremost requirement for the implementation of the set agendas is a stable government that performs.”

Getting it Right

Any agenda without administrative and electoral reforms targeting transparency, better public services, economic security, empowering people at the grassroots level along with restoring faith of the common man in political institutions will not prevent erosion and destruction of the biggest democracy from within (“What India Needs”, May 11).

Festering Wounds

It is tragic that despite so much evidence against Narendra Modi and his cohorts, the Citizens’ Tribunal Report and other reports indicting them, they have been escaping the law and becoming more dominant (“Blast From the Past”, May 11). The Supreme Court’s order is a welcome move in the direction of justice.

RAM PUNIYANI, Mumbai

Narendra Modi thinks he can whip up passions by using his oratorical skills and hence is trying hard to obfuscate the matter about the riots. In the coming days, he has a lot to explain to justify his role in the riots. For now, he is a hero with a halo around his head.

Unemployment is still the main threat to the economic health of our country (“Making People Work, May 11”). We need to increase our aggregate demand, production and income levels and generate employment for every willing hand. The education system should emphasise vocational training, imparting practical knowledge and promoting entrepreneurship rather than raising an army of job-seekers.
