

Declare War on Terror

DECEMBER 15, 2008

Indian citizens are condemned to be permanent victims of jihad and to a political class which has no sense of the nation. Why and how must we fight now to curb the growing menace of terrorism in the country?

“Why blame the politicians after every terror attack? Every country gets the government it deserves and the government is as effective as we, the people, make it.”

United We Stand

The resurgence of the people's voice against political apathy and ineptitude was best summed up by INDIA TODAY team ("Betrayed and Savaged", December 15). But instead of declaring a war on terror, we should declare a war on our inefficient politicians whose acute indifference and political apathy has let Pakistan succeed this far in bleeding our motherland. Apart from periodic empty rhetoric, what have they achieved so far?

Mumbai needs to bounce back and it will. If this anger is able to put pressure on the political class to enact and implement anti-terrorist laws more effectively, step up our security and intelligence network and make the public vigilant, the 'never again' rhetoric will hopefully become reality ("New Terror Strategy", December 8).

high-profile targets in India's commercial capital by highly trained and extremely motivated fiday-eens. The terrorists slaughtered innocent men and women, held people hostage, wrecked havoc and engaged the army, navy and NSG commandos in armed combat for more than 60 hours. This strike is nothing but a warning from our enemy that they are at war with us. It is time to wake up from our slumber and act fast or else we are doomed.

Citizens are hurt, angry, frustrated and helpless. Mere accepting the resignations of Union home minister Shivraj Patil, Maharashtra chief minister Vilasrao Deshmukh and his deputy R.R. Patil is not enough ("Breaking Point",
