

India is blessed with enormous and unique resources. It has huge tracts of fertile land with significant climate and coastal diversity, which help the country grow anything and everything. The country has the largest number of cattle in the world and it produces and consumes more milk and milk-based products than any other nation in the world. Rich in minerals and industrial resources such as coal and mica, it has a vast pool of talented people, eagerly wanting to unlock their potential.

Over the past 200 years, these resources of the country have served the rest of the world. It is now time to serve the nation. Unlocking the potential of the nation is not rocket science. It can be achieved and fast, but only if the nation has the determination and the discipline to do so. Unlocking India's potential will require transforming these vast and versatile resources so that they are more valuable to themselves and the nation. Take for example, a grain of wheat and transform it into a loaf of bread; the value addition is about five times. Similarly, take a rough diamond and polish it with pride into a finished diamond; the value addition is about 20 times. Imagine the value add potential of people who are imparted good education and given better opportunities; the value add will be infinite. In short, how do you make ordinary people extraordinary?

Past efforts at transforming these ordinary resources into extraordinary value to themselves and to the nation have generated, at best, incremental results. At the same time, the society's socialistic pattern, the licence raj regime, and the economic and political isolation of the economy due to the fear of multinationals and colonialism, resulted in a massive exodus of talented people, from whom the rest of the world benefited. What we need now is a different, scalable and speedy solution, considering today's globalising world. There has never been a better opportunity for India to unlock its potential than today. The whole world seems both interested and ready to assist in this endeavour. Here are six specific ideas on how to

A new revolution: Organising an entrepreneurship
movement needs the same spirit that led Mahatma Gandhi

