

A new nation can be built only with a fresh WORK ETHIC, which combines discipline with creativity, passion with respect

It is five o'clock in the morning on a September day by the seaside, away from Puducherry. I am perched atop a 40-ft-high rappelling wall in the middle of nowhere, overlooking the Bay of Bengal. I am waiting to catch a glimpse of the sunrise. The sun will not come out anytime soon, but like a villager who must not miss his train, I like to be nice and early.

Next to me in the breezy darkness, my Canon digital SLR camera is sitting quietly. Beyond the camera is a box full of lenses. This morning, the one that is particularly happy to be here is my newly acquired Sigma 500-mm lens. We are here to capture the first rays bursting through scattered clouds, announcing the arrival of another brand new day. I like my camera, the aluminum box, the tripod. I love the 500-mm lens the most, though. There is something solidly attractive about it. I like his power looks. Yes, it is a he. He clicks into the groove of my SLR every time I slide him in, as if to say, "OK, let's go." Each time I set the vision, his whirr gives me a high. I call him Lens. Lens makes me feel professional.

I can hear the sea waves but cannot see them. The silhouette of a fishing boat is now
