

best go beyond themselves to focus on solving problems that make a difference for others. They aim to transcend traditional boundaries of business and geography to take a global perspective on the world, thereby improving their own and society's fortunes.

Examples abound of those who have turned their passion into enterprises that create wide-ranging value, providing jobs, funding and inspiration. Equally important are those social entrepreneurs who use their leadership to address problems of hunger, homelessness or ignorance directly. I brought an entrepreneurial mindset to my role in management education. Working with my colleagues at the Kellogg School of Management, I have implemented a framework that supports our students and our mission to create global leaders who make contributions of lasting significance. One way we do this is by emphasising the importance of inclusion and collaboration throughout our school's culture. This attitude of "share and care" makes a profound difference in how our students learn, and it influences the kinds of ethical, "people first" leaders they later become. We also provide an innovative curriculum with a range of courses that include many focused on social entrepreneurship and non-profit leadership, alongside our for-profit offerings.

So how can India capitalise on the power of entrepreneurship to transform commercial and social landscapes? In addition to continuing the economic policies that, since 1991,
