

ance of America's unconditional support in the war against terror, India can look up to Big Brother and expect him to stand up against Pakistan if it continues to shelter dreaded terrorists planning and executing sabotage activities against India.

Con Job

If B. Ramalinga Raju with his power, money, influence and hunger for success could manipulate such a big fraud with so much ease, then he can also get out of this self-created mess using the same means ("I.Con", January 26). The political system and judicial loopholes will set him free.

Modi Touch

Gujarat Chief Minister Narendra Modi needs a pat on his back for the astounding success of the Vibrant Gujarat Summit ("Modi's Meltdown Cure", January 26). What stands out is the alacrity at which the state machinery works, like the three-day approvals for the Nano project. He is truly unbeatable. A few more Modis and soon India would be moving forward towards being a superpower.

Rebel Talk

Kalyan Singh had no genuine and justifiable reason to sever his ties with the BJP ("Looking Back in Anger", February 2). Perhaps he seems to have been conned by the Samajwadi Party who showed him the carrot by offering his son an important post in the party. He had always arm-twisted the party for his selfish gains. This time, however, his move may not yield the desired results.

MANEESH AGNIHOTRI

Mayawati's ingenious idea of generating funds through PPP is appreciable, but will her development plank fetch her rewards in terms of electoral gains in the forthcoming polls?

Saffron Schisms

To keep his flock together, the saffron brigade's prime minister in-waiting L.K. Advani may have to do a lot more ("Share-A-Punjab", February 2). In backing SAD party chief and Punjab Chief Minister Parkash Singh Badal on appointing his son Sukhbir as his deputy, Advani has stirred a hornet's nest in the state. With elections round the corner, this may backfire and increase dissidence in the party ranks. So with Bhairon Singh Shekhawat in Rajasthan, Kalyan Singh in Uttar Pradesh, Shatrughan Sinha in Bihar and Uma Bharati in Madhya Pradesh, he should be careful.

Corrigendum

The news item regarding the SPIC MACAY festival ("The Tunes of Change", February 2), carried a picture that wrongly described Shahid Parvez as a santoor maestro. Ustad Parvez is a sitar maestro. The error is regretted.

Identity Crisis

You pay your money and take your choice. The RSS is a nationalist, patriotic body of selfless volunteers. The RSS is a communal, fascist, anti-democratic organisation run by a bunch of bigoted men. The truth, however, lies somewhere in between. And whatever lies members and sympathisers on one side and the critics on the other—who as Chandra Shekhar says, have suddenly discovered that they have been consorting with a leper—might say, there is no denying the fact that the RSS is too big and powerful to be ignored. It evokes strong reactions, for and against, like communist organisations elsewhere, the RSS strikes terror into the hearts of its opponents for the simple reason that it has come to stay in this country. An organisation of one million dedicated and disciplined men with probably ten times as many sympathisers cannot simply be wished away.
