

YOUTH Survey 09

ical freedom. Maybe that vision thing. Maybe he is too gentle to be a politician with a national mission. He gave us the nuclear deal, thank you. Doesn't India now require a bigger deal, a New Deal? The man of our story goes for another cup of coffee, and then he comes to the latest from the mother and son—the arbiter and the inevitable answer to the Congress's prayers. She may be the absolute leader within the party, but she cannot singularly sway India to her way, as the mother-in-law did. He turns to the son, "the Future". Our man is hardly impressed. The Future has been here for a while, learning and preparing, and occasionally sounding different from your average Congressman. Mr Future has not made the difference as a new generation politician, and so our protagonist has to look elsewhere for a leader worthy of 21st century India. His morning becomes politically meaningful as he gets the newest from the chief minister of Gujarat. This one means business, and what he's doing must not be confined to Gujarat alone. India needs him; he is our man's prime ministerial candidate. Some hope, at last.

You have just read about a politically conscious Indian, aged somewhere between 18 and 35, who is straight out of the INDIA TODAY-
