THE STONEMAN MURDERS

Dark Edge

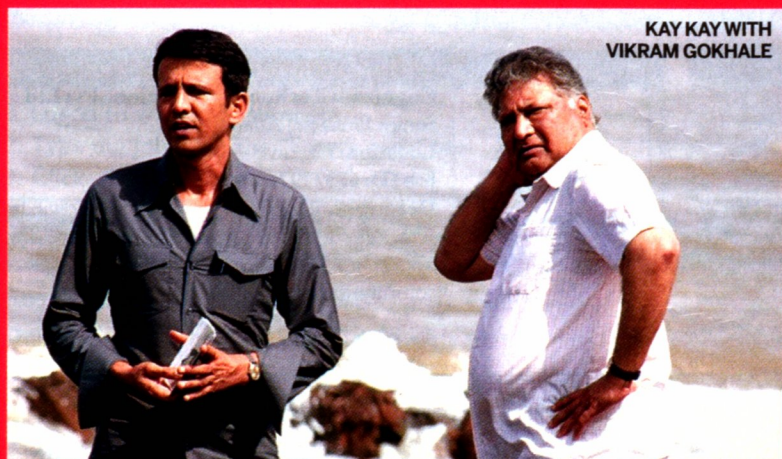

Director: Manish Gupta

Starring: Kay Kay, Arbaaz Khan

The time is 1983. Amitabh Bachchan is on all film posters. Haji Mastan is the don Mumbai. Prem Padminis are very much on the roads. There is only one TV channel. And everyone wears bellbottoms. This is the year of the Stoneman murders in Mumbai, nine horrific killings where victims were hit with huge rocks. Manish Gupta's movie, shot almost entirely at night, recreates that era and the crimes, with a twist. He adds a resolution where there wasn't one. And the explanation seems credible enough to be believable. But it is altogether too grisly and revolting. Too much blood and gore, without a single soft focus moment to relieve the pain. Yes there is an item song which seems thoroughly forced, down to the red bikini clad bottoms of the unfortunate item. And there is also Rukhsar, playing hot-on-the-tail police officer Kay Kay's wife, giving us a prolonged shot of her admittedly beautiful bare back. But no go. There are no winners in Gupta's bleak world of all night kebab joints, homeless people, drug addicts, corrupt police officials and tarty streetwalkers. By the time the movie ends, you feel your head has been crunched under several stones. Heavy ones. -KB

ARTEXHIBITION

Play of Paints

A PIECE BY BROOTA

Rameshwar Broota's trademark is the male figure in his large-sized paintings. The Vadehra Art Gallery presents his exhibition Counterparts: Recent Paintings. Broota has explored the vulnerability, resilience and metamorphosis of human form with time. His recent works show the contrast between the biological, the mechanical, the industrial and the organic. There is an underlying comment on human life and urban decay. In these works, the surface and structure of the animate and the inanimate are often juxtaposed to evoke a tender sensual touch or a dramatic push and pull between them. Aligning his laborious process to stay within the contours of the form, Broota works with meticulous control and visual insight. There is a flawless connection between content and technique. From February 14 to 21 and February 27 to March 9 at the Shridharani Gallery in Delhi.
