

THE WELL-WORN BOOT

ART EXHIBITION

Fresh Breath OF LIFE

Inhale Exhale is the title of the exhibition featuring the latest works by artist S. Shivprasad. Paintings, sculptures and installations featuring the process of breathing form the basis of the show. "Two words contrasting in their actions 'inhale' and 'exhale' is what the process began with," says Shivprasad about his work. The two processes connected to life and existence helped the artiste take the work further. Blurring the lines between the sculptures and installations like the well-worn boot reflects the essential course of action that we live with everyday. The works stand as metaphors for issues ranging from connecting the self to the outside world or architectural fantasy as a part of globalisation. Shivprasad belongs to the new lot of artistes whose journey in art reflects larger national and global concerns. Steering clear of activism, his art attains both social and political relevance by introspection rather than discussion. "There has been a constant striving for the non-existing terminology called 'perfection'. This search has boosted a dedicated sector among the capitalists who are flooding the market with products that provide promise in taking one in the direction of 'delusive realism'," says Shivprasad of his journey, connecting it to the process of breathing. Yahan ke nalon main pani ho na ho, aankhon main pani zuroor hota hai (There may be no water in our taps, but there always is in our eyes). Delhi-6 is full of such big and small statements, all made at a pace matching Abhishek Bachchan's unhurried elegance. Here he pauses to shake hands with a goat, there he stops to shoot pictures of pigeons, and yet again he bites into a jalebi. He is Roshan, half Hindu, half Muslim, an NRI from New York, and pretty sensitive. It's nearly impossible to make a full-fledged movie from a metaphor, that
