The Argumentative Indian

Because everyone who is in trouble or who believes he could be in trouble wants him in their corner, whether it is arch-rivals Mulayam Singh Yadav and Mayawati or long-time foes Lalit Modi and Subhash Chandra.

Because there is hardly any corporate case that he is not arguing and hardly any politician who hasn't sought his advice.

Because he usually wins the cases he fights.

what excites him Taking on a former Pakistani minister in a television debate or arguing against OBC reservation in Central government educational institutions. When Salve talks, people usually listen.

big acquisition A 7-series BMW, breaking his promise to himself that he would "behave".

nice guy move Every evening he helps his wife Meenakshi set up a stained-glass showroom by typing e-mails and suggesting marketing strategies. As he quips, "it's from maximum wages to minimum in the evenings".

I Am Legend

Because a chance remark from him on his blog about Slumdog Millionaire can set off a global controversy.

Because he is an easy target for marginal politicians like Raj Thackeray, looking to establish his political party.

Because after 40 years in the profession, he still remains at the top of the game, and is head of a family that includes an articulate Rajya Sabha MP, an actor who works with the best directors in the business, and another actor who is India's best-known international beauty.

Because the family endorses as many as 10 brands combined and whatever he does sets off a trend, whether it is blogging or walking the red carpet to support his children, be it for Pink Panther 2 or Delhi-6.

favourite pastime Posting blogs that he discusses at times with his family.

embarrassing moment Walking away from Rekha at an awards show when it looked like she was going to kiss him next.
