CHALLENGES OF CHANGE

is shifting away from development and investment. We still have a lot going for us, however. We are a stable democracy and, most importantly, our youth have a very strong entrepreneurial spirit. If you take the creative world, the media world, the IT world, it's the youth who are taking these sectors forward. By 2020, more than 70 per cent of the Indian population will be under 34, and India will continue to be among the most populous countries in the world. Technology tools are shortening the learning curve for today's youth. Today's youth are also the first generation to encounter a flat world, but they also need empowerment and trust from the people who have shaped our economy and our country in previous decades. Our youth power also has a huge responsibility. Our safety net is better than the social systems of the West where unemployment is not being addressed. In the West, normally the individual is left to fend for himself. We have respect for our seniors; we take care of our parents and elders and our family values remain strong. I think we should take credit for taking all these responsibilities as part of our inherent culture in India. So in conclusion what I feel is this: the Indian youth have a world of opportunity and responsibilities ahead. In my view, it is not important as to who drives the change we need today but instead focus on and ensure we get the change we need. I have no doubt in my mind that the youth of India will play a very major role in that change.
