

Sexual exploitation by any older caretaker is, by this definition, incestuous because it destroys that natural trust. This is true whether the perpetrator is a relative by blood or marriage, parent, step-parent, older sibling, neighbour, family friend, teacher, member of the clergy, therapist, physician, baby-sitter, camp counsellor, or any other caretaker. The effects are similar: the child's environment becomes unsafe, confusing and frightening.

Due in part to the prohibition against incest, it is less likely to be disclosed than any other form of sexual contact. A number of factors contribute to maintaining secrecy and silence, leading a psychiatrist who works with victims of sexual abuse to say, "There is no taboo against incest; the taboo is against talking about it." Regardless of its origin, its taboo plays a role in maintaining secrecy, fear and shame about the activity. Thus, paradoxically, it may serve to sustain the very behaviours it seeks to prevent.

Factors beyond the prohibition itself contribute to keeping the child victim or adult incest survivor silent, including:

- In many societies the family is seen as sacrosanct. Psychotherapists and counsellors who work with Indian clients have noted that the centrality of family in Indian life makes it virtually impossible to work with an individual without understanding the larger family context.

- The child victim fights with the conflict of love and loyalty toward the perpetrator.

- The incest victim, regardless of age or specific circumstances, often carries a burden of personal shame about the experience.

- In some societies, particularly for girls, there is a fear that disclosing sexual activity will cause her to be treated as "damaged goods", destroying her marriageability, or leading to severe punishment.

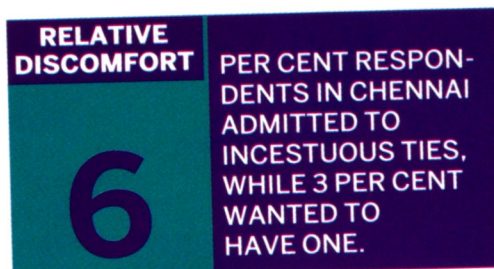

- Boy victims may fear being shamed as weak or not masculine enough.

- In the case of same-sex incest, cultural homophobia (the fear of being seen as homosexual) contributes to keeping the child or adult survivor silent.

- If any part of the experience felt pleasurable or arousing, it may not be perceived as harmful.

- There is widespread ignorance, denial, minimisation, and even romanticising of the harmful effects of childhood abuse.

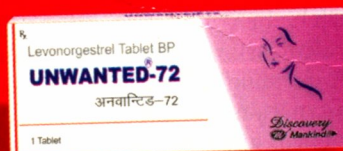

- Perpetrators employ a variety of means to ensure

What should I do?

last night my husband did not take precaution
but I do not want to be pregnant easy tension free solution Take Unwanted-72 within 72 hours.

UNWANTED-72

Emergency Contraceptive Pill

For further information visit our website: www.unwanted72.com
It is not a substitute for condoms and does not protect against STD/HIV/AIDS. Available at all leading chemists.

