Who doesn't recognise these lines? Even when they have not been in use for years, the words linger on in the public memory. That, in essence, is the power of the brand. However, the value of the brand is not in just coming up with catchy taglines but in products or services that distinguish them from their peers and keep them in collective memory. The success therefore, lies in how well they manage to woo and keep their consumers happy.

The twenty-first century Indian consumer is radically different from his '80s counterpart. He earns more, has more spending power, is discerning, brand-conscious and is well-informed about the choices. He wants value for his money but does not hesitate to pay a premium for a product or service that he thinks are special. So the challenge is for the companies to match the expectations and demands of this ilk.

The Indian economy marked a rapid growth rate of 9.6 per cent in 2006-07, establishing the fact that India is the 'destination in demand' for more brands. From Walmart to Ferrari, they are all heading here.

With so many choices, which are the brands that the consumers prefer most?

And which of those brands perfectly match the needs of the consumers? That is always the aim of the CNBC AWAAZ Consumer Awards.

In the last three years, India's No.1 Business News Channel, CNBC AWAAZ has strived to give Indian consumers a voice that can be heard loud and clear. A voice that today speaks to 30 million viewers every month.

For the fourth year running, a detailed study was undertaken by CNBC AWAAZ along with The Nielsen Company to identify India's most preferred brands, analyse what sets them apart and understand the consumers' perception of these brands. The result: CNBC AWAAZ Consumer Awards 2008. Given in six main segments viz., Consumer Durables, Telecom, FMCG, Financial Services, Retail and Automobile with 17 product and service categories under them, the awards help identify leaders in each with an understanding of the driving factors that make each of them a winner.

Special emphasis on the rural areas marks the CNBC AWAAZ Consumer Awards 2008, with an attempt to understand what is that the rural consumer really prefers. The study was accordingly, conducted in 84 rural centres along with 21 urban centres in 12 different states. What emerged was the changing face of the Indian economy, globalisation of the Indian mindset and brands that have consistently matched the pace of change.

CONSUMER DURABLES

The category saw LG clearly emerge as the preferred brand across both the white goods and consumer electronics segment. The key drivers that typify the category are reliability and trustworthiness, while people in the East zone gave particular emphasis to product
