

film review Wrong Number

HELLO

Rating: ★☆☆☆☆

Director: Atul Agnihotri

Starring: Sharman Joshi, Sohail Khan, Gul Panag

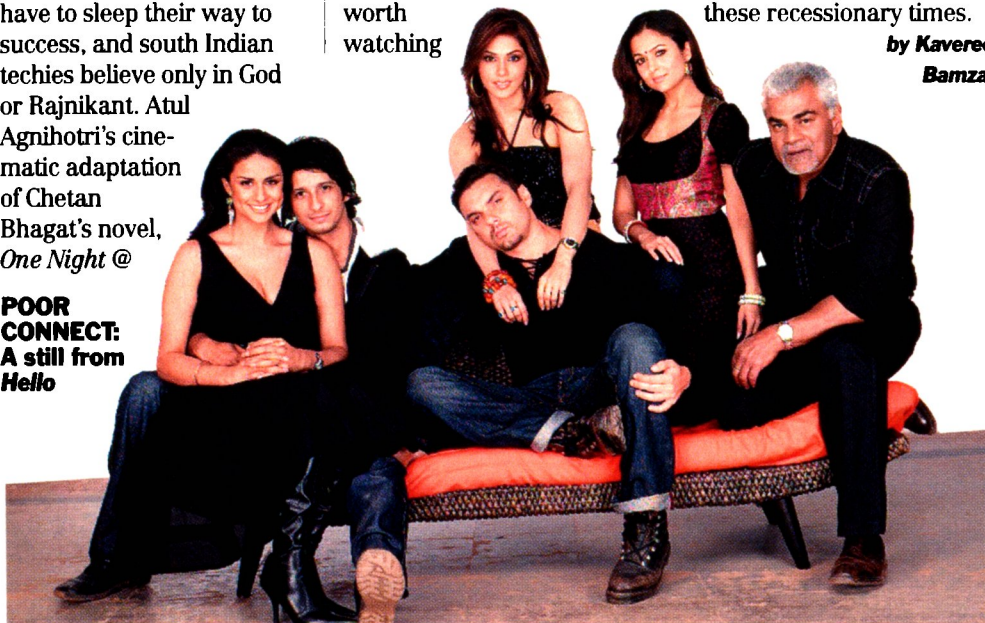

Americans are idiots, dutiful daughters-in-law hooked to anti-depressants are cheated on by their husbands, wannabe models have to sleep their way to success, and south Indian techies believe only in God or Rajnikant. Atul Agnihotri's cinematic adaptation of Chetan Bhagat's novel, One Night @

POOR CONNECT:
A still from Hello

The Call Centre is bleaker than the novel. It is also far less interesting. Bhagat had got the spirit of this particular breed of young Indian right, flush with easy money and easier success. Here they're just being played by Bollywood actors who are either too old or too muscular to be believable. The film is also set in perhaps the most depopulated call centre in the history of cinematic BPOS. What's worth watching though is the inherent misogyny of the guys—as Joshi's character says, girls love with their hand on the heart but marry with their hand on the wallet. And the feistiness of the women, who are not above seducing their man in the backseat of an SUV or proposing to him on their knee. This is a movie, to borrow Marlon Brando's famous line, that could have been a contender. Now it's just a dated curiosity in these recessionary times.

ROOH-E-ISHQ

At a time when there are hardly any takers for ghazals,

Pitamber Pandey's RooH-e-Ishq is a brave attempt. A teacher at the Gandharva Mahavidyalaya, his velvety voice suits this form of music and expresses pain as well as joy beautifully in the album.

CALL OF THE RIVER

The journey of a river can be described as that of romance and adventure. In this album, sitar maestro Shujat Hussain Khan pays tribute to some of the great rivers of India that have acted as a common thread in binding the diversity and local cultures across state borders together.

art exhibition Three's a Treat

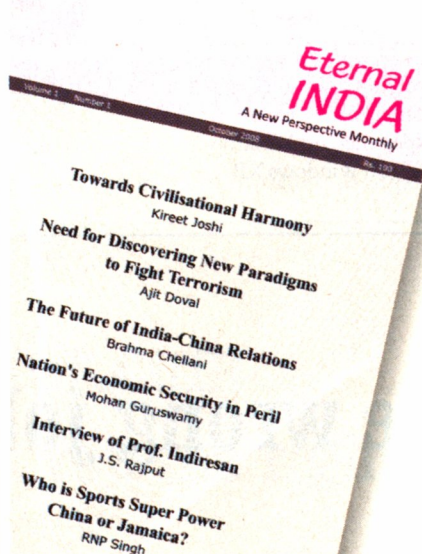

KOLKATA It is not often that one gets to see the works of masters, and naturally the joy is manifold if three of the greatest contemporary artists are on view under one roof. 3 Masters, Briefly brings together drawings and sculptures by Francis Newton

Souza, Jagdish Swaminathan and Meera Mukherjee. Souza is considered to be the pioneer of international modernism in 20th century Indian art, while Swaminathan's monochromatic works on display validate his belief in the non-representation of any phenomenon. Mukherjee's sculptures are down to earth and have a bold earthy feel about them. At Akar Prakaar from October 14.
